

The official U.S. policy to unite the borders, security, and economies of the U.S., Mexico, and Canada are the gravest concern that faces our nation right now. The unreported facts surrounding the mutual unification plan of the three nations are so disturbing to me that I wonder whether we have a population who cares enough about this country and U.S. sovereignty to speak out against it. Our Executive branch is right now working hastily to implement a North American government while the nation sleeps under the spell of a war on terror. The Bush administration faces increased heat by the media for losing credibility on Iraq, but meanwhile, they face no MSM scrutiny for causing America to lose its sovereignty and the protections guaranteed by the Constitution.

The "America At War" thread needs to refocus itself on the most pressing task at hand. Right now our biggest battle isn't in the ME, it's at home on the borders that are still present and in the Congress that, at least for a short time, is still tasked with representing only Americans. Winning in Iraq or anywhere else won't do us a damn bit of good if we let the media distract us from the fact that we are losing our country in the process.

The most frightening part is that this discussion board probably attracts folks who more patriotic and more politically astute than the average American, yet there is no active movement to protect or preserve this Republic from the people who are working effectively to destroy it. It's being dismantled from the inside out and it's gonna fall with hardly a whisper.

On March 23, 2005, President Bush convened a special summit in Waco, Texas, with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin. The three amigos met at Baylor University to call for a "Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America" before retiring to the president's ranch in Crawford. The trio of leaders instructed their respective cabinet officials to form a dozen working groups and to report back within 90 days with concrete proposals to implement the new "partnership."

On June 27, cabinet ministers of the three countries issued their joint report, entitled Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America. Signing the report for the United States were Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff and Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez. They and their counterparts from Mexico and Canada state in their introduction to the report:

We recognize that this Partnership is designed to be a dynamic, permanent process and that the attached work plans are but a first step. We know that after today, the real work begins. We will now need to transform the ideas into reality and the initiatives into prosperity and security.

The key phrase here, "dynamic, permanent process," should set off alarm bells. Like NAFTA and CAFTA, to which it is intimately tied, this new "partnership" is intended to be an ongoing, constantly evolving process to bring about the economic, political, and social “integration” and “convergence” of the three nation states into a supranational regional system of governance that will then be merged into a larger regional system for the entire hemisphere — which includes the proposed FTAA (Free Trade Area of the Americas). It is this dangerous, subversive process that should command every American’s immediate serious attention.

On July 27, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Roger F. Noriega told a House Subcommittee concerning the new partnership: “Thus far, we have identified over 300 initiatives spread over twenty trilateral [meaning U.S., Canada, and Mexico] working groups on which the three countries will collaborate.” What is being concocted in the hundreds of “initiatives” underway by these “working groups”? We don’t know, and that’s a major part of the problem. They have only revealed a very small part of their program thus far. The new “partnership” comes replete with pledges of “transparency.” That’s supposed to mean that all dealings will be above board and open and visible to the public. We hear a lot about transparency at the United Nations, the World Trade Organization, NAFTA, and other international forums. But there’s an old saying that applies here: “The more he talked of honor, the faster we counted our spoons.” So it is with the international elites who craft the global and regional agreements: the more they talk of transparency, the more you know they are covering up.

The so-called Security and Prosperity Partnership (SPP)* was launched by the newly elected Presidents George Bush and Vicente Fox in 2001 as the “Partnership for Prosperity.” (There’s no mention of Security in the original project.) President Fox was pushing for more U.S. financial aid, amnesty, and legalization for Mexicans already in the U.S. illegally, and easier access for more Mexican “guest workers” into the United States. Fox said he wanted “as many rights as possible, for as many Mexican immigrants as possible, as soon as possible.” In a June 21, 2001 interview, he declared, “Those Mexicans that are working in the United States should be considered legally working in the United States.” Mexico’s foreign minister, Jorge Castañeda, echoing Fox’s demands for legalization and more guest workers, told reporters, “It’s the whole enchilada or nothing.”

We have three choices. 1) Read it and do nothing, 2) read it and weep, or 3) read it and recognize that the WOT isn't nearly as direct or imminent a threat as the SPP, and join the effort to save this country before our national borders, national economy, and national security are no longer sovereign.

This process is moving swiftly. We had Mexican and Canadian military boots on the ground in New Orleans and the people of America had no clue about what kind of precedent was being established. The criticality of this issue is unprecedented besides the Civil War and the American Revolution. It needs to be acted upon now. Research the issue. If you recognize the threat, tell people and write your local, state, and federal reps. The only tool to fight this battle is knowledge.
