Stop the Port Deal

by Melanie Wooten

Concerning the transfer of control of several American ports to DP World, President Bush has stated, "I want those who are questioning it to step up and explain why all of a sudden a Middle Eastern company is held to a different standard than a [British] company". ("Bush Threatens Veto Against Bid to Stop Port Deal", The Washington Post, February 22, 2006). I am stepping up to explain my view on this situation, as requested.

The difference is that a publicly held and traded British stock company, Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Company (P&O), was purchased by Dubai Ports, a state-owned and controlled agency of the United Arab Emirates (UAE), creating a single entity, DP World, also state-owned and controlled by the UAE. P&O shareholders approved the sale just last week.

Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution for the United States of America states in part that "He [the president] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; ...". An agency of our government, Committee for Foreign Investment in the United States, created by Executive Order in 1975, is said to have investigated and approved the transfer, and members of this committee went on national television on the weekend talk shows to explain the president's actions, so while a business transaction between a British company and a UAE entity is NOT of interest to the United States of America, the fact that the assets of P&O included management of several US ports makes this transaction more properly a treaty between two nations, placing it directly under the purview of the Constitution. The US Senate is required under Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution to exercise ITS jurisdiction over any and all treaties, just as it did with former Presidents Carter and Clinton.

The quote above alludes to the fact that approval of this treaty is possibly an exercise in profiling, which has become a buzzword since September 11, 2001. The fact that member states of the UAE have been linked to the events of 9/11 but subsequently cooperated with the US to bring to justice those who would further harm the US does not abrogate the responsibility of the US senators to approve treaties. In an election year, the US Senate should be even more scrupulous in the fulfillment of its constitutional obligations.

Using the power of the presidency to bypass the deliberative process laid out by the Constitution is only permitted in times of war. Only the US Senate has the power to declare war and it has not done so; therefore, this unilateral action by the president is in reality a treaty between two sovereign nations. Only the US Senate has the power to approve this treaty or not, as provided by our Constitution. Nothing else is acceptable or permitted under our Constitution.

OIL PRICES

by Gerald Mueller, Member of the NFC from Wisconsin

I think everyone who can think for themselves knows who controls oil prices.

It's the stock market. The price of oil is regulated by the traders on the floors of the stock exchanges. The higher prices they can get for a barrel the more the big oil companies make off the hard working consumers. If the barrel was removed from the market don't you think we would have a much lower price at the gas pump and heating oil deliveries?

When big oil companies reap a profit of over $36 BILLION dollars in one year there has to be someone pulling the purse strings and that's the market.

Back in 2001 there was an oil reserve consisting of approximately 300,000 acres in the North Peten Basin of the Republic of Guatemala, Central America.

This reserve is said to easily contain ten billion barrels of reserve oil. In 2001 the price of a barrel I believe was around $25.00. There was a joint venture entered into between WesPac Technologies Corp. headquartered in Dallas, TX and Tradestar Corp. to purchase 77.5% of the shares of Bassano-Guatemala Ltd., a Bermuda Corp. and owner of PetroRamrod, S.A. WesPac also uses their WP-2000 Stimulator Tool which helps to extract crude oil and natural gas from almost depleted wells.

What ever happened to this 10 billion barrels of oil? Was it capped until the prices got higher?

WesPac's investor relation agent and consultant is Tim Matula, Matula Associates last contact number printed was 425-836-9035 or matula@cnw.com.

Here in, Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle called for an investigation of the big oil companies. They sent some representatives to Milwaukee and thanks to my State Senator Joe Leibham here is the link you may click on to listen to these hearings which were held toward the end of 2005.

www.uwex.edu/ics/stream/doa/governor

I personally have not gotten through the full listing session and I don't know how long it is.

Notes: A 42 U.S. gallon barrel of crude oil yields slightly more than 44 gallons of petroleum products. This "process gain" in volume is due to a reduction in density during the refining process.

America and the United Nations

by Mark Steyn
Journalist

MARK STEYN, a columnist for the Chicago Sun-Times, also writes for the Daily Telegraph and the Spectator in Britain, the Western Standard in Canada, the Australian, Hawke's Day Today in New Zealand, and the Jerusalem Post. In addition, he is drama critic for the New Criterion, writes National Review's "Happy Warrior" column, and appears regularly on the Hugh Hewitt Radio Show. He has published two collections of writings, The Face of the Tiger and Mark Steyn from Head to Toe, and a book on musical theater, Broadway Babies Say Goodnight.

The following is abridged from a speech delivered on December 5, 2005, at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D.C., at Hillsdale College's sixth annual Churchill Dinner.

At one level, the United Nations is merely the latest variant on the Congress of Vienna held almost two centuries ago—a venue where the great powers sit down to resolve the problems of the world to their mutual satisfaction. Unfortunately, unlike Lord Castlereagh, Prince Metternich and Talleyrand, none of whom would be asked to audition for a “We Are The World” charity fundraising single, the UN has become the repository of all the West’s sappiest illusions of one-worldism.

Let me give an example. Nearly three years ago, the space shuttle Columbia crashed, and Katie Couric on NBC’s Today show saluted the fallen heroes as follows: “They were an airborne United Nations—men, women, an African-American, an Indian woman, an Israeli....” By contrast, there’s a famous terror-supporting Islamist imam in Britain, Abu Hamza, who, when the shuttle crashed, claimed it was God’s if it’s approved by the UN?

The Real UN

In fact, however, the UN is a shamefully squalid organization whose corruption is almost impossible to exaggerate. If you think—as the media and the left do in this country—that Iraq is a God-awful mess (which it’s not), then try being the Balkans or Sudan or even Cyprus or anywhere where the problem’s been left to the United Nations. If you don’t want to bulk up your pension by skimming the Oil-for-Food program, no need to worry. Whatever your bag, the UN can find somewhere that suits—in West Africa, it’s Sex-for-Food, with aid workers demanding sexual services from locals as young as four; in Cambodia, it’s drug dealing; in Kenya, it’s the refugee extortion racket; in the Balkans, sex slaves. On a UN peace mission, everyone gets his piece.

Didier Bourguet, a UN staffer in Congo and the Central African Republic, enjoyed the pleasures of 12-year-old girls, and as a result is now on trial in France. His lawyer has said he was part of a UN pedophile network operating from Africa to southeast Asia. But has anyone read anything about that? The merest glimpse of a U.S. servicewoman leading an Abu Ghraib inmate around with girlie knickers on his head was enough to prompt calls for Donald Rumsfeld’s resignation, and for Ted Kennedy to charge that Saddam’s torture chambers were now open “under new management.” But systemic UN child sex in at least 50 percent of their missions? The transnational morality set can barely stifle their yawns. If you’re going to sexually assault prepubescent girls, make sure you’re wearing a blue helmet.

And at least the Pentagon put a stop to Abu Ghraib. As a British UN official in the Congo told my newspaper in London: “The crux of the problem is that if the UN gets bolshie”—that’s Britspeak for complaining aggressively—“with these governments then they stop providing the UN with troops and staff.” That’s the system in a nutshell: when a British bigwig is with British forces, he’ll enforce British standards; when a British official is holed up with an impeccably “multilateral” force of Uruguayans, Tunisians, etc., he’s more circumspect. When in Rome, do as the Visigoths do. In Congo, the UN had to forbid all contact between its predatory forces and the natives. The rest of the world should be so lucky.

The child sex racket is only the most extreme example of what’s wrong with the UN approach to the world. Developed peoples value resilience: when disaster strikes, you bounce back. A hurricane flattens Florida, you patch things up and reopen. As the New Colonial Class, the UN doesn’t look at it like that: when disaster strikes, it just proves that you and your countrymen are children who need to be taken under the transnational wing. The folks who have been under the UN wing the longest—indeed, the only ones with their own permanent UN agency and semi-centenarian “refugee camps”—are the most comprehensively wrecked people on the face of the earth: the Palestinians. UN territories like Kosovo are the global equivalent of inner-city housing projects with the blue helmets as local enforcers for the absentee slum landlord. By contrast, a couple of years after imperialist warmonger Bush showed up, Afghanistan and Iraq have elections, presidents and prime ministers.

Let’s just take one of the scandals that go widely unreported in the American media—the UN Oil-for-Food program. Among the targets of the corruption investigation was Kofi Annan’s son Kojo—who had a $30,000-a-year job but managed to find a spare quarter-million dollars sitting around to invest in a Swiss football club. The investigators then broadened their sights to include Kofi’s brother Kobina Annan, the Ghanaian Ambassador to Morocco, who has ties to a businessman behind several of the entities involved in the scandal—one Michael Wilson, the son of the former Ghanaian Ambassador to Switzerland and a childhood friend of young Kojo. Mr. Wilson is currently being investigated for bribery involving a $50 million contract to renovate the Geneva offices of the UN World Intellectual Property Organization.

The actual head of the Oil-for-Food racket, Kofi sidekick Benon Sevan, has resigned, having hitherto insisted that a mysterious six-figure sum in his bank account was a gift from his elderly aunt, a lady of modest means who lived in a two-room flat in Cyprus. Paul Volcker’s investigators had planned to confirm with auntie her nephew’s version of events, but unfortunately she fell down an elevator shaft and died. It now seems likely that the windfall had less to do with Mr. Sevan’s late aunt than with his soliciting of oil allocations for a company run by a cousin of Kofi Annan’s predecessor, Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

Despite current investigations into his brother, his son, his son’s best friend, his predecessor’s cousin, his former chief of staff, his procurement officer and the executive director of the UN’s biggest ever program, the Secretary-General insists he remains committed to staying on and tackling the important work of “reforming” the UN. Unfortunately, his Executive Coordinator for United Nations Reform has also had to resign.

You’d think that by now, respect for the UN would be plummeting faster than Benon Sevan’s auntie down that lift shaft. After all, these aren’t peripheral figures or minor departments. They reach right into the heart of UN policy on two of the critical issues of the day—Iraq and North Korea. Most of the Ghanaian diplomatic corps and their progeny seem to have directorships at companies with UN contracts and/or Saddamite oil options.

What’s important to understand is that Mr. Annan’s ramshackle UN of humanitarian money-launderers, peacekeeper-rapists and a Human Rights Commission that looks like a lifetime-achievement awards ceremony for the world’s torturers is not a momentary aberration. Nor can it be corrected by bureaucratic reforms designed to ensure that the failed Budget Oversight Committee will henceforth be policed by a Budget Oversight Committee Oversight Committee. The Oil-for-Food fiasco is the UN—the predictable spawn of its utopian fantasies and fetid realities. If Saddam grasped this more clearly than, say, Katie Couric or John Kerry, well, that’s why he is—was—an A-list dictator and they’re not.

Why was there an Oil-for-Food program in the first place? Because back in the 90s, having thrown a big old multilateral Gulf War and gotten to the gates of Baghdad, the grand UN coalition then decided against toppling Saddam. So, having shirked the responsibilities that come with having a real policy, America and its allies were in the market for a pseudo-policy. And where does an advanced Western democracy go when it wants a pseudo-policy? Why, the UN! Saddam correctly calculated that the great powers were over-invested in Oil-for-Food as a figleaf for their lack of will, and reasoned that in such an environment their figleaf would also serve as a discreet veil for all kinds of other activities. He didn't game the system; he simply understood far better than Clinton and Bush Sr., John Major and Tony Blair how it worked.

Failures of Transnationalism

Transnationalism is the mechanism by which the world's most enlightened progressives provide cover for its darkest forces. It's a largely unconscious alliance, but not an illogical one. Western proponents of Kyoto and some of the other loopy NGO-beloved eco-doom-mongering concepts up for debate in Montreal at the moment have at least this much in common with psychotic Third World thugocracies: they find it hard to win free elections, they regard transnational bodies as useful for conferring a respect unearned at the ballot box, and they are unduly troubled by the lack of accountability in global institutions.

Those of us who believe that big government is by definition remote government—and that therefore the UN's pretensions to world government make it potentially the worst of all—should, in theory, argue for withdrawal from the organization. Outside of a few college towns and coastal enclaves, I don't believe there would be any political downside for candidates campaigning on a platform of pulling out of the UN entirely, and I'd encourage Republicans to do so if only as a way of unnerving those lazy pols like John Kerry who are prone to mindless transnationalist boosterism. But as a matter of practical politics, I can't see the U.S. leaving the UN anytime soon.

Can the U.S. force the UN to reform itself? Look at it this way: With hindsight, the UN was most effective when it was least effective—that's to say, the four decades between Korea and the Gulf War, when the Cold War's mutually-assured vetoes at least accurately represented the global stand-off. Now, however, we're in a unipolar world. As a result, the UN is no longer a permanent talking-shop for the world's powers but an alternative power in and of itself—a sort of ersatz super-power intended to counter the real one. Consider the 85 yes-or-no votes America made in the General Assembly in 2003: Arab League members voted against the U.S. position 88.7% of the time; ASEAN members voted against the U.S. position 84.5% of the time; Islamic Conference members voted against the U.S. position 84.1% of the time; African members voted against the U.S. position 83.8% of the time; Non-Aligned Movement members voted against the U.S. position 82.7% of the time; and European Union members voted against the U.S. position 54.5% of the time.

You can take the view of the European elites that this is proof of America's isolation and that the U.S. now needs to issue a "Declaration of Interdependence" with the world. Or you can be like the proud mom in Irving Berlin's WWI marching song: "They Were All Out Of Step But Jim." But what these figures really demonstrate is that the logic of the post-Cold War UN is to be institutionally anti-American. The U.S. could seize on Kofi Annan's present embarrassment and lean hard on him to reform this and reorganize that and reinvent the other and, if it employs its full diplomatic muscle, it might get those anti-U.S. votes down to...a tad over 80%. And along the way it would find that it had "reformed" a corrupt, dysfunctional, sclerotic anti-American club into a lean, mean, functioning, effective anti-American club. Which is, if they're honest, what most reformers mean by "reform."

In the old days, ramshackle dictatorships were proxies for heavyweight patrons, but not any more. These days, psychotic dictators represent only themselves. Yet somehow, in the post-Cold War talking shops, the loony tunes' prestige has been enhanced: the UN, as Canadian writer George Jonas puts it, enables "dysfunctional dictatorships to punch above their weight." Away from Kofi and Co., the world is moving more or less in the right direction: entire regions that were once wall-to-wall tyrannies are now filled with flawed but broadly functioning democracies—e.g., Central and Eastern Europe and Latin America. The UN has been irrelevant to this transformation. Its structures resist reform and the principal beneficiaries are the thug states.

What Actually Works?

What should replace the UN? Some people talk about a "caucus of the democracies." But I'd like to propose a more radical suggestion: nothing. In the war on terror, America's most important relationships have been not transnational but bilateral: Australia's John Howard didn't dispatch troops to Iraq because the Aussies and the Yanks belong to the same international talking shop; Tony Blair's reliability on war and terror isn't because of the European Union but in spite of it. These relationships are meaningful precisely because they're not the product of formal transnational bureaucracies.

When the tsunami hit last year, hundreds of thousands of people died within minutes. The Australians and Americans arrived within hours. The UN was unable to get to Banda Aceh for weeks. Instead, the humanitarian fat cats were back in New York and Geneva holding press conferences warning about post-tsunami health consequences—dysentery, cholera, BSE from water-logged cattle, etc.—that, its spokesmen assured us, would kill as many people as the original disaster. But this never happened, any more than did their predictions of disaster for Iraq: "The head of the World Food Program has warned that Iraq could spiral into a massive humanitarian disaster." Or for Afghanistan: "The UN Children's Fund has estimated that as many as 100,000 Afghan children could die of cold, disease and hunger."

It's one thing to invent humanitarian disasters to disparage Bush's unilateralist warmongering; but in the wake of the tsunami, the UN was reduced to inventing a humanitarian disaster in order to distract attention from the existing humanitarian disaster it wasn't doing anything about.

In fact, the whole idea of multilateral organizations feels a bit last millennium. With hindsight, institutions like the UN seem like a hangover from the Congress of Vienna age when contact between nations was limited to the potentates' emissaries. That's why transnationalism so appeals both to Euro-statists and to dictators—the great men of the world meeting together to decide things for everyone else. But, in the era of the Internet, five-cents-per-minute international phone rates, bank cards issued in Finland that you can use in an ATM in Brazil or Fiji, and blue collar families taking cheap vacations in the Maldives and Bali, the bloated UN bureaucracy seems at best irrelevant and at worst an obstruction to the progress of international relations. I'm all in favor of the Universal Postal Union and the Berne Copyright Convention, but they work precisely because dysfunctional dictators weren't involved. The non-nutcake jurisdictions came together, and others were required to be in compliance before they could join. That's why they work and endure. Transnational institutions should reflect points of agreement: Americans don't mind the Toronto Blue Jays playing in the same baseball league—and even winning it occasionally—because they're all agreed on the rules of baseball. A joint North American Public Health Commission, on the other hand, would be a bureaucratic boondoggle seeking to reconcile two incompatible health systems. Imagine then what happens when you put America, Denmark, Libya and Syria on a human rights committee, and then try and explain why the verdict of such a committee should be given any weight when the U.S. is weighing its vital national interest.

It's a good basic axiom that if you take a quart of ice cream and a quart of dog mess and mix 'em together, the result will taste more like dog mess than ice cream. That's the problem with the UN. If you make the free nations and the thug states members of the same club, the danger isn't that they'll meet each other half-way but that the free world winds up going three-quarters or seven-eighths of the way. Indeed, the UN has met the thug states so much more than half way that they now largely share the dictators' view of their peoples—as either helpless children who need every decision made for them, or a bunch of dupes whose national wealth can be rerouted to a Swiss bank account.

Perhaps that malign combination of empty European gesture-politics and Third World larceny would be relatively harmless, at least in the geopolitical sense, if these were quieter times. But they're not. This is an age in which America and its real allies—a bigger number than you'd think—need to be free to act without being a latter-day Gulliver ensnared by Lilliputian UN resolutions from head to toe. After all, consider the alternative to American action. As you may have noticed, the good people of Darfur in Sudan have been fortunate enough not to attract the attention of the arrogant cowboy unilateralist Bush and have instead fallen under the care of the UN multilateral compassion set. So, after months of expressing deep, grave concern over whether the graves were deep enough, Kofi Annan managed to persuade the UN to set up a committee to look into what's going on in Darfur. Eventually, they reported back that it's not genocide.

That's great news, isn't it? Because if it had been genocide, that would have been very, very serious. As yet another Kofi Annan-appointed UN committee boldly declared a year ago: "Genocide anywhere is a threat to the security of all and should never be tolerated." So thank goodness what's going on in Sudan isn't genocide. Instead, it's just 100,000 corpses who all happen to be from the same ethnic group—which means the UN can go on tolerating it until everyone's dead, and none of the multilateral compassion types have to worry their pretty heads about it.

That's the transnational establishment's alternative to Bush and his "coalition of the willing": appoint a committee that agrees on the urgent need to do nothing at all. Thus, last year the UN Human Rights Commission announced the working group that will decide which complaints will be heard at its annual meeting in Geneva this spring: the five-nation panel that will select which human-rights violations will be up for discussion comprises the Netherlands, Hungary, Cuba, Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe. I wouldn't bet on them finding room on their crowded agenda for the question of human rights in Cuba, Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe.

One of the mystifying aspects of UN worship is the assumption that this embryo world government is a "progressive" concept. It's not. Most of us in our business and family and consumer relationships are plugged into global networks far better for the long-term health of the planet than using American money to set up Eurowimp talking shops manned by African thugs—which is what the UN Human Rights Commission boils down to. Judging by Results

Go back to that tsunami. While the UN and its agencies were on television badgering and hectoring the West for its stinginess, the actual relief efforts were being made by a couple of diverted U.S. naval groups and the Royal Australian Navy. The Scandinavians can't fly in relief supplies, because they don't have any C-130s. All they can do is wait for the UN to swing by and pick up their check. And it says something for the post-modern decadence of the age that that gives you supposed moral superiority.

There's a moment in the latest Batman movie in which Bruce Wayne has just bumped into his childhood sweetheart, Rachel Dawes, in the lobby of some Gotham City hotel. Unfortunately he's sopping wet, having been cavorting in the ornamental fountain with a couple of hot pieces of arm candy. Rachel is a crusading district attorney and Bruce can see she's a bit disappointed to discover her old pal is now Paris Hilton in drag. So he attempts to assure her that deep down he still cares about all the worthy stuff. Rachel swats this aside. It's not what you feel inside that counts, she says. "It's what you do that defines you."

Bruce wanes, visibly, under her withering riposte. I wouldn't claim this film has anything as coherent as a philosophy, but its director thought enough of that line to reprise it late in the action. "It's what you do that defines you," Batman whispers to Rachel before diving off a rooftop to go whump the bad guys. "Bruce...?" she says, faintly.

A couple of days after seeing this film I read that the Oxfam international aid organization had paid the better part of a million bucks to Sri Lankan customs officials for the privilege of having 25 four-wheel-drive vehicles allowed into the country to get aid out to remote villages on washed-out roads hit by the tsunami. The Indian-made Mahindras stood idle on the dock in Colombo for a month as Oxfam's representatives were buried under a tsunami of paperwork. Fourteen Unicef ambulances sent to Indonesia spent two months sitting on the dock of the bay wasting time, as the late Otis Redding so shrewdly anticipated.

The tsunami may have been unprecedented, but what followed was business as usual—the sloth and corruption of government, the feebleness of the brand-name NGOs, the compassion-exhibitionism of the transnational jet set. If we lived in a world where "it's what you do that defines you," we'd be heaping praise on the U.S. and Australian militaries, who in the immediate hours after the tsunami dispatched their forces to save lives, distribute food and restore water, power and communications.

According to my favorite foreign minister these days, Australia's Alexander Downer, "Iraq was a clear example about how outcomes are more important than blind faith in the principles of non-intervention, sovereignty and multilateralism.... Increasingly multilateralism is a synonym for an ineffective and unfocused policy involving internationalism of the lowest common denominator. Multilateral institutions need to become more results-oriented."

Which is pretty much the Batman thesis: It's what we do that defines us. And we'll do more without the UN.

Do we have Traitors at the Helm?

by Virginia Brooks, Member of the NFC from Ohio

*Fact: Just released facts stating "CIA jets flying terrorist {suspects} to secret prisons for torture. Authorities have admitted for the first time {NATS} National Air Traffic Services have traveled through England on a number of occasions. These people have been charged with no crime & are held and tortured for years, some U.S. citizens!

*Fact: We are in an undeclared war, thousands of our military killed in a foreign land, that has never attacked the U.S. {Bush has stated the Constitution is just a G-d d - n piece of paper} No President Bush, it is the most important piece of paper besides the Bible that was ever written, abide by it or be Impeached!

*Fact: {CBS} The U.S. Has spent more than a quarter of a {Trillion} dollars in the first three years of the undeclared war in Iraq. More than $50 Billion has gone to private contractors hired to guard bases, drive trucks, feed and shelter troops, and to rebuild the country, these were unbid contracts with no oversight. Billions are uncounted for, and many of these contracts were never delivered!

*Fact: Bush has allowed the sale of 22, not just 6 or 8, but 22 ports, to people who have caused us harm, remember 9-11? {United Arab Emirates} Does our Congress have enough b-lls to stop the president of the U. S. from further endangering our country by allowing Terrorists to take over those ports? Maybe you will remember that Jimmy Carter allowed the giveaway of the Panama Canal, which we bought, built, and owned in perpetuity. Our Congress allowed this to happen along with the Chinese taking over ports in LA. They now have control of both ends of the Panama Canal.

*Fact: We allow Congress and our President to cut programs important to our Veterans and elderly, but we can spend $592 Million Dollars on a new Embassy in Iraq, Billions of dollars building new bases in Iraq, $billions$ more on rebuilding Iraq when they have one of the biggest Oil reserves in the world, and I ask you what happened to the huge buildings of money found in Iraq, why aren't they using it for these purposes. We have military in 141 countries around the world, which will continue forever, and we will be in Iraq for years! We also allow our government to donate Billions of dollars of foreign aid to countries that continually vote against US in the UN.

*Facts: We have lost Constitutional Rights under Bush's watch through the Patriot Act. Imminent Domain, spying on American Citizens, Search and Seizure without warrant, Protesters attacked with brutality, completely ignoring the constitution, spying on our bank accounts, telephone calls, and our e-mail accounts, they want to spy on what books we read in the library, {to prove we are enemy combatants or a terrorists by what we read} all of these items are against our constitutional rights.

*Fact: We must hold all people in government, whether it is local, state or federal, to the law, we all have to be beholden to, and they must be held accountable. If any candidates have taken money illegally they should be held accountable, they should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law, and they should not be allowed to run for office ever again.

North American Reservation – Reap and Sow

by Nancy Levant

The United States of America was, undoubtedly, the greatest nation of all history. In its original mission and intent, it was a nation that elected to free religious belief from persecution. All religions were quickly welcomed into the United States of America, with the exception of the Native American religions, which were very nearly and forcibly destroyed until the 1970s. This was and is a permanent scar on this nation. I, myself, am sincerely ashamed and sorry for this.

In its original mission and intent, it was a nation whose citizens realized that they were duty-bound to protect the open-armed values of freedom for all. And even when America fell into the misguidance of slavery, it freed slaves in record historical time, for slavery was contrary to God's law and fundamental decency and compassion. America was willing to learn and think and act accordingly and rapidly, except for the Native Americans, who were, and remain to this day, a retained and reservation'd population. Somehow and for some reason, Native Americans were excluded from freedom for all.

In its original mission and intent, the United States of America understood that tyranny was held in check by the ability of the masses to own private property, to work according to self-determination, and to achieve according to one's desires and abilities. In other words, America realized that all men were to be equally regarded and with the opportunity that freedom provides – minus Native Americans, who were literally forgotten, generation after generation, by the American masses.

As generations of American people enjoyed the original mission and intent of Constitutional governance, we were constantly reminded in our schools, churches, synagogues, and temples that we were lucky to live upon these lands. We were told that freedom was precious. We were told that our government was safe and steadfast, and that our elected represented the will of the American people. But times have changed. In fact, the original mission and intent of our Constitutional government began to decline around the period of the Civil War, as politicians began playing ball with foreign lenders.

Then, in 1913, and as if by magic, the Federal Reserve System appeared and was set into stone without the consent of the American people. And from 1913 to 2006, The Fed remains the same. It is a corporation. It is not a governmental agency, office, or law-making body. It is a corporation, and that corporation has purposefully, intentionally, bankrupted this nation into un-payable debt. Why, you ask? As the Federal Reserve Corporation is a foreign/central banking partnership, it does not represent the interest of the United States. Its purpose is to weaken, and thereby dismantle the American economic structure in order that foreign banks, with their philanthropic and corporate partners, and their global political puppets and governors can force America to concede to global government. This they have accomplished.

And following suit, and over the decades, elected officials began to shake hand with foreigners and foreign organizations. And as the Industrial Revolution brought veritable fortunes to many corporations and families around the world, the hand-shakers began forging formal relationships called commissions and councils. They, together, formed many philanthropic organizations, and began the financial entrapment apparatus called "grants." This apparatus was much akin to the banking apparatus called "loans." In a nutshell, monies were and continue to be given in return for interest payments, or to create a desired technology, or to further a political cause, or to mask or make palatable systems that are against the best interest of the public or humanity. The "giving of money" became the infrastructure that dismantled the original intent and mission of the United States government. Hence, we now have the implementation of the new and global economic system, which is the centralized banking/partnership/NGO-stakeholding bureaucracy.

This central banking system has, and will continue to 1) eliminate the right to private property by individuals, 2) enforce debt and interest as its means to amass unending streams of wealth, 3) enforce the globalization of taxes via drinking water, uses of other natural resources, mining, ocean use including travel rights, 4) taxation to support a global military apparatus, 5) taxation to support the mandatory Biosphere Reserves, and of course, many other taxation strategies.

As it was certainly anticipated that the American populace would resist the internal dismantling of their government, the global apparatus also determined that "security" would become an important component of its one-world government. Using the philanthropic and grant-funding system, globalists hired science to assist them in achieving their security goals. The hired efforts and achievements of science in the last century, and particularly so in the last three decades, is beyond the comprehension and knowledge of 99% of the world's population. Spying capabilities have come full circle and to full fruition. There is literally nothing that is not observable in today's world.

Mail, driver's licenses and plates, and all electronic devices (computers, phones, cars, blackberries, etc.), and bar code purchases all carry within them the technologies which allow for listening in, or tracking, and/or collecting by large databases. Privacy, aka the 4th Amendment, is gone. We did not ask for this. The global planners wanted and paid for this technology, and with the help of their hired national politicians, it mattered not that the technologies were illegal as per laws or the Constitution. Our national politicians simply got the job done.

Ecology is another philanthropically funded science. That branch of science was given a corporate mission to accomplish, and that mission was called Biosphere Reserves. Massive funding supported ecological research in order that pre-defined outcomes were provided. Those outcomes mandated that the Earth was dying due to overpopulation, private property rights, and human or urban sprawl. Ecologists grabbed their grant dollars and wrote requested reports for the world's highest councils and commissions and, lo and behold, the Biosphere Reserve system was up and running – globally. One should note that the Biosphere Reserves tend to include the largest bodies of fresh water and watershed systems on the planet. You will also find oil, natural gas, gold, silver, copper, uranium, platinum, etc. beneath the Biosphere Reserves.

The United Nations has declared its intention to tax all usage of fresh water and to distribute it equally all over the globe. The trouble with that intention is that the United Nations is also the organization that stands by and watches highly planned genocidal atrocities in action. "Equality" is hardly the MO of the United Nations.

Now, I could go on for pages and pages, documenting a thousand other activities, charters, Memorandums of Understanding, summits, gatherings, etc., that further demonstrate the hand-shaking wheeling and dealing of the globalist and their centralized government, but what is interesting to me is the sudden connection I feel to the plight and history of the Native American people.

I see American people losing their ability to stay on their lands. Between the taxes, Eminent Domain, the locking down of American land by eco-partnerships, the development organizations, who have now partnered themselves to state governors, who are themselves partnered to federal globalists, AND the compulsory Biosphere Reserves, that are re-surrounded by “conservation corridors,” which are themselves re-circled with “buffer zones (the definition of buffer zone is ‘demilitarized zone’),” American people, as well as the rest of the world’s people, are being forced into “human settlements,” as so defined and mandated by the United Nations Agenda 21 document. The American Biosphere Reserves are now beginning to overlap. “Human settlements,” the term described by Agenda 21, are reservations – nothing more – nothing less.

I see “reservations” being established, globally, and particularly so in the United States, which is the greatest perceived barrier to global government. But on top of mankind’s movement into reservation-style living and communities, I also see panoptical technology, which is also funded by philanthropic grants and organizations, added to the herding mix.

So, here’s where we stand: Rules, laws, taxes, regulations, and licensure have made it extremely difficult to maintain ownership of private property. Private property ownership is fast becoming the domain of the rich – only. People all across the globe, but particularly so in Westernized nations, are being herded into collectives called planned and deed-restricted communities and “live-work units,” which are corporately owned and administered housing complexes. Massive acreages in the United States are being rapidly – daily - purchased by land trust organizations, like The Nature Conservancy, who then typically re-sell those acres to governmental bodies, who are themselves chartered to, treaty’d with, and partnered to the United Nations and World Bank.

What I am telling you is this: Think carefully about America’s Native Americans. Think carefully about their history – the one you, yourselves, have personally ignored your entire lives. Consider the intentional destruction of their cultures, their histories, their religions, their health, and their intentional drugging. Consider it well. What goes around comes around. What is reaped is that which is sown. And the only mistake made by our beloved Native American people was this: They trusted their destroyers. They signed their treaties and believed what aristocrats told them. They trusted. They shook hands. And to this day, they paid the ultimate price in the losing of everything they knew and held dear.

We are falling into another historical trap. Another aristocracy is enforcing their will upon the masses, and this time, they’re going for the globe. History repeats. Wake up, America. History repeats.

Rally To Enforce the Laws and Legal Operation of this Nation!

On April 17, 2006 at 1:00 pm EST, victims of legal abuse, legal reformers, Constitutionalists, and freedom-minded people and organizations, who demand legal Constitutional governance, will:

?Join together at the Rayburn Congressional Office Building, the location of the House Judiciary Committee in Washington, DC, to demand that the Committee hold hearings on legal abuse in America.

?Lawyers and activist organizations are needed to attend and take action/ organization plans home to their individual states.

?For information on how to get involved NOW, and to advertise this rally in all 50 states, please contact The Patriot Caucus at www.patriotcaucus.com and the Citizens Justice Institute at www.citizensjustice.com.

It’s time to enforce the laws and legal operation of this, OUR nation! Pass this information onto at least 5 people and/or organizations, and ask them to do the same.

Congress must take a look at Big Oil profits!

Submitted by Dan Kairis, NFC Member from Illinois

The time has come for Congress to take a look at oil company profits, especially in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. If you drive a car — or ride a bus, a train or a plane — you’re being gouged.

Gulf Coast states Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana are much in the news. They took a terrible hit Monday from Katrina. The loss in lives and treasure won’t be known for days, if not longer. But the effect of that storm is being felt across the country right now.

Louisiana is second only to Texas in production of crude oil and natural gas. By Monday morning, Katrina had forced the shut-down of a million barrels a day of oil-refining capacity, and the price of crude oil had passed $70 per barrel.

As the price of gasoline and home-heating oil close in on $3 a gallon, it’s fair for all consumers to ask, Where is the money going?

The answer is straight into the pockets of Big Oil.

The economies of China and India are bustling like never before. But two emerging economies, however bustling, don’t account for Big Oil’s big gains.

Since January 2002, Big Oil profits have tripled to $125 billion on sales of $1.5 trillion, according to Oppenheimer & Co. analyst Fadel Gheit.

But that money is needed for searching out oil fields, digging wells and laying pipeline, isn’t it? Sure it is, but most of that work has been done — when oil was selling, profitably, in the range of $20 per barrel, and that was not recently.

Big Oil prices rose 35 percent during the first three quarters of 2004, and increases continue. Big-Oil shareholders, of course, are making a buck as profits soar. And since many oil companies are buying back their shares, that’s pushing up the price. Gheit notes:

Exxon Mobil profits rose 32 percent in the second four months of 2005. That amounts to $7.6 billion for a company that is debt-free with $25 billion on hand.

British Petroleum profits are up 38 percent, $6.7 billion.

For Conoco Phillips, the numbers are 56 percent and $3 billion.

Gheit makes clear that not just Big Oil is awash in profits. The steady increase in the price of crude oil began in December 2003. Saudi Arabia now is taking in $208 million more per day than it was in November 2003.

The price of gas and oil approaches $3 per gallon, and we grudgingly pay that at the pump or when the fuel truck arrives. But worse may lie ahead:

When the shippers that deliver everything from oranges to blue jeans to compact discs start charging more to cover their fuel costs.

When the makers of petroleum-based products — from foam coffee cups to polyester clothing to computer shells — start charging more.

When you find you can no longer buy the stuff you could easily afford.

It's time Congress had a chat with Big Oil, before big trouble arrives.

SPIRAL OF IMMIGRANT CORRUPTION IN AMERICA

By Frosty Wooldridge

"Corruption becomes a mechanism by which Third World societies operate," Heath Boatwright said. "When you immigrate millions of them illegally into the United States, you create exactly the same lawlessness in our country. They feel at home because so many of their countrymen break the law with fellow illegal aliens that it is a 'normal' continuance of their behavior in our civilization."

Back in Athens, Georgia today, Boatwright lived in South America for several years. He observed how societies operated with an edge toward corruption in all aspects of their people and governments. How can I vouch for Boatwright's observations? I traveled for nine months on bicycle throughout South America. I saw what he saw. It's not pretty.

When I wrote about corruption in Mexico and other Third World countries, I mentioned that citizens must bribe mail carriers or suffer their undelivered mail. In Asia, you must get your letters cancelled at the post office or they will steal stamps off your envelope. Bribery is a way of life when it comes to the police in Third World countries. When a car accident occurs in Mexico, all parties split the scene. Why? No one wants to be caught because they don't carry insurance, no licenses, have outstanding warrants or they may be carrying drugs.

To give you an idea of how fast the United States careens into Third World standard operating procedure, in Greeley, Colorado last year, police recorded 270 hit and run accidents last year. Greeley, with less than 70,000 residents, houses the largest contingent of Mexicans in Colorado. They illegally work at the meat packing plant. They drink like fish after work. They drive. With these realities, driving on Saturday nights in Greeley places you in great danger.

In Colorado's Department of Motor Vehicles, last year, two Hispanics employees gave over 200 illegal aliens Commercial Driver's Licenses and hundreds regular licenses. Those illegals couldn't read a test let alone take it or pass it with their sixth grade educations in Spanish. Yet, they drove on our highways in 50,000 pound 18-wheelers running at 70 miles per hour and were implicated in over 26 crashes.

Colorado suffered three deaths by illegal aliens in the past year. Illegal drunken Mexicans killed two Americans, Justin Goodman and Dale Englerth. One Mexican shot and killed Officer Don Young in cold blood. How did they get away with it? Our own corrupt leaders from Governor Owens down to Denver Mayor Hickenlooper support city sanctuary policies and aid the illegals to remain in Colorado against federal laws.

Colorado estimates 300,000 illegal aliens operating within its borders. They defraud the state out of millions of dollars in welfare claims, anchor babies, food stamps, assisted housing, felony crimes, drug distribution and burglaries in homes and businesses.

How about Texas? They harbor 1.5 million illegal Mexicans and others from Africa and Asia. It's SO saturated with illegals that they are considering use of illegal aliens to teach Spanish in our schools to illegal alien kids! How frickin' crazy and totally insane is that? In the meantime, their hit and run numbers run off the charts. Who pays? Texans pay with higher insurance rates and taxes for schools totally flooded with illegal alien kids. Last October, an illegal alien killed Officer Brian Jackson in Dallas.

"There is not only great concern that the drug trade is becoming more aggressive, but that terrorist organizations are seeking to exploit our porous border," Governor Rick Perry of Texas said. "Last year alone, 135,000 people who are not of Mexican descent were apprehended entering Texas illegally. The threat is real, and it grows each day."

Check out Arizona! A year ago, they suffered 57,600 stolen vehicles making Phoenix the new car jacking capitol of the world. With 500,000 illegal aliens in Arizona, schools have turned into gang wars and education has turned into a farce. To top that off, Arizona suffers millions and millions of tons of trash and human waste running the length of their border with Mexico. Mexicans think trash, soiled baby diapers, urine bottles and garbage belong anywhere but a trash can. It's so bad that the Arizona governor declared a 'state of emergency' driven by the invasion of illegal aliens last year. Too little, too late!

How about Georgia? In 2002, they paid out $27 million for illegal alien anchor babies out of their citizens' taxes at the state level. Illegal aliens receiving public assistance cost them $42 million. Illegal aliens tapped into $63 million of free health care that cost Georgians. Illegal alien convicted felons cost Georgians $15 million for prison costs.

California stands at the forefront of this national nightmare. The corruption, graft, cheating on taxes, paying no taxes, horrific crimes from the '18th Street Gang' along with MS-13 Gang defies imagination. Get this! In the past five years, 86 California hospitals and ER wards bankrupted! California suffers $38 billion debt. Over two million kids go to school in trailers along with hordes of illegal alien kids. Los Angeles is no longer an American city and the crime and graft is now in the hands of Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa who is an advocate for La Raza and 'Reconquista de Aztlan' or reconquest of the four Border States. We simply allowed so much illegal alien migration that now, Villaraigosa has embedded himself into Los Angeles to help more Mexicans take over the city. How did he get elected? Try voter fraud by more than three million illegal aliens residing in LA. Today, Los Angeles is unfit for Americans to live there. Given enough time, it will mirror the slums, crime and misery of Mexico City.

How about Maine? Governor Baldacci signed an executive order making his state the first to give sanctuary to all illegal aliens. It's against federal law to "...aid, abet, encourage, assist or in any way help an illegal alien to remain in the United States no matter what your personal convictions." USC 8, 1324, 274, 275, 276. Their social services are being overrun and overwhelmed. This illustrates how far and high corruption rises in government.

Yet, the lawlessness grows like a runaway cancer. Denver Mayor Hickenlooper broke immigration laws before becoming mayor. Instead of going to prison, he laughs at the law even while one of his hired employees killed Officer Don Young in cold blood. The City Council of Boulder, Colorado snores while its sanctuary policy helped eight illegals rape eight Boulder women. The Boulder city mayor sighs while Dale Englerth's family suffers from their father's death at the hands of a drunken Mexican who had been stopped nine times before killing Englerth.

I can write about Colorado with only 300,000 illegals and see the lawlessness first hand because I live there. States like North Carolina with over 1,000,000 illegals suffer consequences three times that of Colorado. Chicago has turned into another Mexico. Miami is now North Havana, Cuba!

Bear-Stearns' report last year showed $400 billion in unpaid IRS taxes by illegal aliens annually and exposed it as the world's second largest underground economy. Who makes up that money? You do! The report didn't show the $60 billion in cash transfers being sent out of our country annually! While cheating, raping, stealing and killing us—they send our money back home.

Take a guess at the cost of illegal aliens in state and federal prisons annually. Try a whopping $1.6 billion to keep over 500,000 illegal aliens and legal criminal felon immigrants locked up! They equal 29 percent of all criminals in our prisons. That's after they've committed crimes of rape, murders, robberies, child molestation, drug trade, sex trade and worse on our citizens.

When this Congress and president blissfully sit by making excuses for illegal aliens in our country, against our laws, against our Constitution—while law-abiding American citizens get their hearts cut out—it's disgusting, sickening and pathetic at the highest levels of government. It's even more sickening when you realize that their corruption grows with such men as lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Worse, Abramoff got caught while God knows how many like him don't get caught! If we dug deeper, we'd find that corruption is a way of life for who knows how many of our elected senators and congressmen. How many more Duke Cunningham's ($2.4 million in kickback bribes) and Tom Delay's are out there lying, cheating and screwing Americans out of money and out of our country—all for the green back dollar?

I can't wait for the investigation to show the $8 billion unaccounted for as to expenditures in Iraq as reported on CBS Evening News last Friday, February 10, 2006. Anyone want to bet that Halliburton's abuse of our war dollars will be a bigger scandal than Abramoff? What's worse, our young men and women are getting killed while those people at Halliburton get rich.

The lawlessness doesn't stop there. Third World corruption infects every sector of our society. Employers of illegals relish income tax evasion. They force Americans out of jobs. Consequently, our working poor stand in food stamp lines, unemployment lines, welfare lines and other avenues of degradation. Can you imagine the fraud of the H-1B, H-2B and L-t visas? Our finest high tech workers suffer displacement by cheap Third World immigrants who work the same jobs for peanuts. Somebody enriches their wallet at the expense of Americans. Our citizens become victims of illegal alien crime, drugs, school chaos and drunken highway madness.

Think beyond next month, next year, next decade. What happens when we add another 20 million illegals on top of the 20 million we already have? What happens when we add another 10 million legal immigrants from these same countries—and we are—to our country in the next 10 years?

No matter how you define it, humanitarian or not, as their numbers grow, our consequences accelerate. How far do you want to go down this rat hole? Keep silent, never speak up, don't complain, always go with the flow, watch it from the sidelines, pride yourself in not being called a racist or xenophobe, trust your senators and congressmen—soon, like the citizens of Mexico or any degraded country—you too will be another victim of Third World corruption.

More sobering, America will be a Third World country.

The New Frontier Coalition Preamble

We, the members of the New Frontier Coalition (NFCUSA), stand united in a common understanding that the political leaders in the United States of America have not been performing their oaths of office with the best interests of "THE PEOPLE" as their primary concern. Furthermore, their performance has not been in accordance with the Constitution. Therefore, it is the ultimate intent of the New Frontier Coalition to support "third party" politics in the United States.

We intend to offer every concerned citizen the opportunity to join the New Frontier Coalition so they may assist in the struggle to re-establish individual, constitutionally guaranteed, inalienable rights and freedoms. Furthermore, our goal is to produce ethical, accountable politicians who will work to protect the rights of individuals and families, and who will put the future of the American citizens first and foremost, above all other interests in the world.

It shall be the policy of the New Frontier Coalition to be a positive, unifying force, providing solutions to current problems within the United States and it's Territories. The New Frontier Coalition holds that individual responsibility and accountability are imperative to our sovereignty. With the understanding expressed above, we welcome all concerned citizens to join us in this critical undertaking and to stand united as we prepare for the New Frontier.
